Native leaders sentenced to jail in mining protest March 18, 2008

From the Globe & Mail/FGN site:
 OTTAWA -- Native leaders from a remote Northwestern Ontario reserve were sent to jail in handcuffs yesterday for opposing mining on their traditional lands, as an opposition leader blamed the Ontario government for failing to resolve the conflict. Chief Donny Morris, deputy chief Jack McKay and four band councillors each received six-month sentences for contempt of court from the Ontario Superior Court in Thunder Bay. It was the second time this year that aboriginal leaders have been jailed in Ontario over mining blockades. Moreover, the umbrella group representing native reserves across Ontario's North said that it is severing all talks with the province in light of yesterday's development. The six people sentenced yesterday are from the Kitchenuhmaykoosib Inninuwug (also known as KI or Big Trout Lake) First Nation, about 600 km north of Thunder Bay. The natives are in a dispute with Platinex Inc., an exploratory drilling company, which holds more than 220 mining claims in the area to look for platinum deposits. The court issued an order last fall allowing Platinex to begin drilling, but when company representatives landed in Big Trout Lake on Nov. 6, natives and an aboriginal OPP officer threatened to arrest them if they proceeded, Mr. Justice George Smith said yesterday. "If two systems of law are allowed to exist - one for the aboriginals and one for the non-aboriginals - the rule of law will disappear and be replaced by chaos," he said.
